And it made flashbacks and telling stories out of order part of the culture - a little too much, in my opinion, but it definitely worked in this show. So in a way, Desmond caused the crash of Flight 815, but considering that Jacob was the one who brought Desmond to the island, arranged the circumstances that required him to push the button, and carefully selected the passengers on the flight, the electromagnetic surge and the subsequent plane crash were all part of his plan.

Afterward, Jacob's spirit appeared to Jack and the others, and he explained why he'd brought them to the island and that he needed one of them to be its new protector. Unfortunately, he found himself paralyzed from the waist down again, as he was before the crash.

The Entire Lost Timeline Explained

Reading that part, as a Dutchman, was very distracting because of several unnecessary mistakes. Sayid met Rousseau, and the group worked to balance survival with solving the mysteries of the island, including the smoke monster, polar bears, the Others, and the hatch.
