In general, the Staatliche Museen Berlin Berlin state museums as well as other museums in Europe and the USA rule out, with few exceptions, the possible return of antique objects of art. Foutakis, the artists of this Altar wanted the spectator standing on the axis in front of the staircase to see two Ionic temples following the golden ratio, and, coming through these temples, to enter a courtyard proportioned to the golden ratio.

It is supposed that the Athena temple located on the acropolis terrace above it may have been its cultic point of reference, and the altar possibly served solely as a place of sacrifice. There were several technical innovations for the time: the figures are staggered in depth; architectural elements are used to indicate activities taking place indoors, and the landscapes are lush and scenic. This foundation is still preserved and can be examined on site in Pergamon.
