Evaluation Bibliography

It also notes the growing pressure resulting from the HIV and AIDS epidemic and increased poverty and unemployment evidenced in increasing numbers of orphans and vulnerable children. Interactions of source and method were also found: written information best described the tasks and language; insiders compared with outsiders provided richer information on tasks and technical terms; written introspection was a more efficient way to collect information on tasks and language use than were unstructured interviews, but this applied for outsiders and not for insiders; and surreptitious recordings were better for baseline data on language use.
