His career coincided with the 'Whig Supremacy' - he was a stalwart supporter of that party and of the Hanoverian monarchs and just as fervently opposed to the Stuart-supporting Jacobites. It marked arguably the last occasion on which a British monarch was able to remove a Prime Minister purely because of personal animosity, a privilege that would in future be entirely ceded to parliament. He continued to lead his party until 1911 but, despite stepping down, his career was far from over and he became First Lord of the Admiralty in the wartime coalition, then Foreign Secretary.
