Proxistant Reading: Toward a Critical Pedagogy of the Nahḍah in U.S. Comparative Literary Studies in: Journal of Arabic Literature Volume 43 Issue 2

Abstract Courses that teach modern Arabic literature, particularly those that address students of comparative literature or other non-specialists, often focus on relatively recent exemplars of the canon. It is important to note here that Arabic uses the same form for both types of the present, the simple and the continuous. Main Content Impasse and imposture—if not sheer impossibility—haunt the dream of translatability.
