Abstract	People worry a lot about death—about how to avoid it, of course, but also how to think about it. As they develop cognitively from the onset of conscious awareness in early childhood, they gradually come to recognize that death is universal, inevitable, and irreversible, and that it involves the complete cessation of all motion, feeling, sensation, and thought—a state of consciousness that is designated the “biological” concept of death (Harris, 2018; Pennington, Hopkins, Nelson, Wurst, &amp; Griffiths, 2018; Watson-Kovacs, Bouch, Harris, &amp; Cooper, 2017). This biological concept of death would be well be sufficient to ensure that death would be the human imagination, probably people are attempting to imagine the end of all imagination, and compelling them to consider death as something that is not of all that comes from a state of conscious experience (which would be an unrecognizable reality of existence, but the human mind is complicated, messy, and often irrational). In many minds, by the age of 10 years, the biological concept of death coexists with supernatural ideas that the soul, which is detached from the body, persists beyond death, goes somewhere else, and becomes transformed, sometimes distributed and sometimes purified and reborn. Such beliefs provide historical evidence and diverse manifestations across all cultures all across the world and in all historical periods (Lowe, Zhu, Evans, &amp; Wolman, 2018; Parkes, Kellehear, Koppell &amp; Long, 2016; Parkes, 2010). The supernatural concepts of biological and supernatural ways of envisioning death often generate contradictory and incoherent. The anxiety produced by uncertainty is yet another road to imaginative activity (Martin &amp; van den Bos, 2014; van den Bos, 2000; Weng, Bollen, &amp; Gilmer, 1998).
