Battle of Long Island (Sometimes Called the Battle of Brooklyn)

• On August 27, 1776, the British and Americans engaged on the tip of Long Island at what is now Brooklyn. This becomes the battle of the American Revolution that has the largest number of troops involved. The Americans initially held the high ground, but the British circle behind them using the (unguarded) Jamaica Pass. Once encircled, the Americans fled and were slaughtered in large numbers. They retreated to Brooklyn Heights and were trapped against the East River. Washington and almost the entire Continental army faced capture and defeat. This was one of the most crucial moments in the war. The British expected Washington to surrender. This was what a European general would have been expected to do. But at night in the fog, Washington evacuated his troops to Manhattan by rowboat.
