By this stage, unemployment had increased slightly to 1.

The Commonwealth, the Balance of and the Politics of International Poverty: British Aid Policy, 1958

At times, the Liberals suggested that investment could be funded partly from cuts in current government spending, including the savings on unemployment benefit which would result from the job creation programme; national development was thus a true economy. Between July 1957 and December 1969 they increased their stake in the ownership by value of British quoted equities from 12.
