Urban Agriculture: A Survey of Academic Expertise and Programs in Canada

Various types of indoor and outdoor pests, from fungi to microbes, insects, and weeds are commonly found in urban environments. One example is the Issues in Alternative Agriculture course offered at MacDonald College, McGill University. The development of peri-urban studies in Canada is an unavoidable consequence of associated research.

Urban Agriculture: A Survey of Academic Expertise and Programs in Canada

The mixed methods case study approach employs a combination of qualitative methods, including personal interviews with city planners, developers and farmers; and empirical methods including a spatial analysis of two ALR study blocks that are under pressure of urbanization. The founding members of this group work for the Toronto Food Policy Council, Grow T.

In the Count Your Trees In project, the Urban Forests Centre worked in conjunction with Global ReLeaf and Active Living to develop a program that assists community groups conducting tree inventories in their neighbourhoods. Today, livestock rearing in urban boundaries is often prohibited because of health concerns. Although the exact boundaries of urban forests are still in dispute, they often refer to all trees within the environs of all populated places, from the tiniest villages to the largest cities.
