Social Work with Elders: A Biopsychosocial Approach to Assessment and ...

The assumption is that individual choices are, more often than not, informed by rational preferences, and that rational individuals will use information, probability, and cost benefit analysis to determine a preferable course of action. Erikson believed that the ability to effectively move through these stages is shaped by both biological and sociocultural forces, and that the transition between these stages is often inspired by social crisis. Use of the medical model made sense as scientific advances yielded not only direct cures but also preventative measures for serious diseases such as vaccinations.
