New Confucianism 新儒家

The main goal in new Confucianism is to pursue sagehood in daily life.

They had planned to wait for the Prince of Jin to depart from the palace in the morning and use that opportunity to attack the palace. After this incident, however, the officials began advocating sending the Turks away from the heart of the state. Taizong subsequently played a pivotal role in defeating several of the dynasty's most dangerous opponents and solidifying its rule over China.

However, the Turks were fearful of Xueyantuo and initially refused to head to their new location. Xue Ju, in light of his victory, was ready to launch an assault on Chang'an itself, under Hao Yuan's advice, but suddenly died of an illness in fall 618 and was succeeded by Xue Rengao. Note: In calculating the moving wall, the current year is not counted.

Wang, in fear, considered abandoning Luoyang and fleeing south to Xiangyang, but as his generals pointed out that his only hope was Dou, he surrendered. There was yet another incident in which Li Jiancheng, knowing that a horse threw its rider easily, had Li Shimin ride it, causing Li Shimin to fall off from it several times. When this was discovered, Emperor Taizong forced Li Youliang to commit suicide.

She joined forces with Li Shimin and her husband Chai Shao. The positions held by these self-exiled Confucians often yielded a passion of diaspora and an obsession of China in their discourses. In summer 626, they were making another attack, and under Li Jiancheng's suggestion, Emperor Gaozu, instead of sending Li Shimin to resist the as he first was inclined, decided to send instead.
