There are many reasons to use the shuffle and a good class exercise is to work out the advantages of the shuffle and the ideal situations to use it, but also the disadvantages and when not to use it. Wing-flashing has been observed in most of these species as well as the closely related brown thrasher and gray catbird. In 1960, ornithologist Robert Selander suggested that mockingbirds flash their wings in situations that make them anxious, like when they are on the ground exposed to predators.

Bird Watcher's General Store

. . If you read mockingbird literature, such as that in many popular field guides, the wing-flashing is explained as a foraging technique.

Bird Watcher's General Store

In fact, the only time that I've ever come close to flashing anybody was when I fell at the beach last year and accidentally ripped a hole in the knee of my bathing suit. They forage for insects by startling them so the insects flush from cover.

Flashing Wing

I have 2 mockingbirds that respond when I open my front door to a particular whistle I created.

Flashing Wing

The wing patches are mostly hidden when the wing is folded; a flying mockingbird shows them well. A Galapagos Island mockingbird was seen wing-flashing a snake? The most commonly held theory is that the bird flashes its white wing-bars while it is hunting, in order to startle insects, thus making them more visible to be caught. The bird took a couple of quick steps, stopped, and in a few jerky movements lifted and spread its wings, showing off its white wing patches. They know they're getting blueberries. He thought the wing-flash was a kind of ritualized intention to fly that evolved as a social signal and acquired the coincidental benefit of flushing insects.
