Furthermore, some of the indicators are published for candidate countries and other non-member countries. On the investors' side, the benefits come from more investment opportunities. In these sectors, the assessment of allocative efficiency often resulted in negative values, indicating that an equal distribution of labour across the different size classes would be more efficient.

IATA

Member States put the greatest effort into addressing CSRs related to the financial sector whereas CSRs related to structural reforms had the highest percentage rate of non-implementation. In total, this is over 40% of the Australian labour force.
