For Gill, sculpture and draughtsmanship were extensions of the hand that was not divided from the mind or the heart, but which moved and felt along with them instinctively like the hands of a lover. How often do things like this ever even come up for sale? You see, shall we suppose, a plain building, and in the apparent centre of it, whatever its actual geometrical shape, slightly raised so that it may be visible to all, the altar with crucifix above or upon it. After reading several works of Arthur Pentty — another founder of Distributism — and finding that he was a socialist, communist and anti-Catholic, I thought I should look into some of the other members of this little known English movement of the early 20th century.
