The poet

While in the beginning he condemned Ch'ien's character and actions after the fall of the Ming but allowed his works to continue in circulation, as he became more familiar with Ch'ien's works and, at the same time, elaborated his own self-image as a scholar, poet, and historian, the emperor's increasing fury led him to decree the destruction of all Ch'ien's writings wherever they might be found. As a result, it was kept secretly and never released to the reading public. Only at the end of the dynasty was Ch'ien rehabilitated as an exemplar by opponents of the Manchu regime, an evaluation echoed later by writers living in areas under Japanese occupation.
