Unifying Unfair Terms Legislation on JSTOR

This is expected to benefit both business and consumers, as businesses receive a more standardised legal system under which to operate and consumers receive a sufficient and standardised level of protection, regardless of where they choose to make purchases. It is somewhat difficult to gauge to what extent the different national legal orders meet these requirements, but it seems they do not always do so. As a result the new term may also be unfair and the only way to remove it is to start all over again.

In the second {and last} consultation document the DTI returns to some of the issues where there remain policy choices in transposing the directive. Graph 6 shows the number of decisions handed down before and after the deadline for transposition of the Directive.

Consumer rights directive

Both business and consumers would know that they had six years for all statutory rights and remedies with regard to goods that did not conform to the contract. Although contracts for the sale of products or the provision of services are those most frequently concluded between professionals and consumers, the Directive also covers other contracts such as contracts pertaining to guarantees for the benefit of a financial institution or even cases in which the consumers themselves are sellers provided the buyer is acting in the course of business, of course.
