Further Agricultural Holdings Acts came into force in 1914, two in 1920, and a further consolidating Act in 1923. For example younger farmers with large herds and few dependents are more likely to engage with an eradication programme.

Agriculture in the United Kingdom

One of the most controversial aspects of this subject is the way in which enclosure affected the small farmer, cottager and squatter.

Livestock products are the main element of the UK's agricultural output. There was a national feeling that a man who had fought for his country should be entitled to retire to a smallholding on British land that would provide him with a livelihood. Nowadays most new tenancies in England and Wales are Farm Business Tenancies under the 1995 Act, but the 1986 Act tenancies that are still in force may allow for succession, and can sometimes be passed down through up to two generations of tenant.
