This dialectic implies a form of radicalism incomprehensible within Marxism, for the revolutionary subject is not the proletariat, but a racialized nonhuman asserting her humanity. It might be better to speak of the flowering of germinal potencies, that, when nourished, produce a synthetic disjunction between an established order and a source that is always-already rooted within that order but that sprouts in directions that the cultivators of Western ideological landscapes are ill-equipped to arrange. A perusal of the bibliography reveals no such knowledge, even though that material was available as indicated above.
