Australian Aboriginal kinship

The interest of the Pentecost system seemed at first to lie in the possibility thus opened of bringing Melanesian into relation with Australian sociology, a hope which was the more promising in that the people of Pentecost and the Dieri resemble one another in the general character of their social organisation, each being organised on the dual basis with matrilineal descent. The unique thing that makes the kinship of San different is that they resist class exploitation. The case for the former existence of the cross-cousin marriage should occur elsewhere in North America.

Organisations: Working with Indigenous Australians

Of concern is the seriousness of issues and the multiplicity of needs that are common among kinship carers. Given these reform processes and the growth in kinship care placements, a review of literature that draws together issues relevant to kinship care is timely and forms the rationale for this review. Elopement was often supported by love magic, which emphasized love, as well as by the oblique or direct approval of extramarital relations.

Although they were not free to marry immediately, even if they had reached puberty, they might do so after undergoing certain rites, such as subincision. It also helps carers to start support groups. Nevertheless, the records obtained from two independent witnesses, and based on separate pedigrees, agreed so closely even in the details which seemed most improbable that I felt confident that the whole construction could not be so mad as it seemed.
