This area became the hub around which the original settlement developed. The case study review in the previous section of this report explores district-level strategies to address these gaps, strategies that are being implemented in diverse communities across the country. For example, income, family size, and ELL status are set as auxiliary variables and used in several of the imputation models.

Among children in the high-SES quintile, the group in 2010 includes a lower share of white children falling from 78. Eight of the 12 districts explored in this paper are the subjects of published case studies. The failure to narrow gaps between 1998 and 2010 suggests, too, that investments in pre-K programs and other early education and economic supports were insufficient to counter rising rates of poverty and its increasing concentration in neighborhoods where black and Hispanic children tend to live and learn.
