from The Vanity of Human Wishes by Samuel Johnson

I, of course, would like to believe it is the third of these.

Thomas Mann's Civilized Uncertainty

The whole world cannot injure a soul that is fenced with faithful fortitude. The men of the world have their measure of virtue, but that virtue falls short of God, and ends in this life. He only glorifies His Heavenly Father, declares His unity with His Father, and equally declares that He can do nothing without His Father.

The Essays of Montaigne/Book III/Chapter X

The demon of reform has a secret door into the heart of every lawmaker, of every inhabitant of every city. If this garment have rents in it, it is an imperfect garment, and impatience will escape through the rents.
