An Exploration of “A Dog with A Human Mind”

Artists produced spontaneous works depicting three basic emotions: happy, sad, and angry; the artists were then interviewed, and the conversations were analyzed for common themes and differences amongst participants. Human Minds: an exploration — page 25. She calls it point mode.

Human Minds: An Exploration (Large Hardback) [85]

This was not what put me off this time. But though we do not know the process a Doberman uses to arrive at insights, once you have seen one, you have no doubt that they happen.

Episode 108 An Exploration of Social Minds — HumanCurrent

Is it what we cannot see that makes us salivate? Although many breeders of that time attempted to preserve both mind and body, some would ultimately choose body over mind. This leads to some speculations of profound importance, bringing into focus certain questions about the relations between thought and emotion. What choices do we have to make, individually and collectively, and how might we be helped or constrained? The demands of the argument lead to questions about the characteristics of the world's greatest religions, particularly Buddhism, which emerges as relevant in what it has to say about certain kinds of personal growth.
