The Economics of Cotton

The only lands left to the cultivator are the numerous hills, rising often into the magnitude of mountains, bold and steep, but covered with deep, rich, gray, friable soil, universally clothed, in a state of nature, with a growth of majestic oak, chestnut, walnut, locust, buckeye, maple, black birch or mahogany, with frequent appearance in ravines of spruce pine and heavy undergrowth of laurel, and frequently of white pine of great height. The whole surface of this region is generally gently undulating, but occasionally broken by lines of bold, steep hills. Then he moved away and was gone until 1825.
