The people of the parish : community life in a late medieval English diocese (eBook, 2001) [satis.farmjournal.com]

Like the Wife of Bath, people commonly were married at the church door, that is, on the porch, and this semi-sacred public space was a popular spot for business transactions too; one might well hesitate to break an oral contract made at the church door. Thus, whilst the requirements of Lateran IV may seem meagre in some ways, they must be understood with regards to the cultural context into which they were received.

Feasting meant that even people who ordinarily ate quite spare, monotonous meals could regularly look forward to finer delicacies. They reveal the differences between parishes within a single diocese that cannot be attributed to regional variation.

Household Goods and Good Households in Late Medieval London

While medieval marriage might have been more of a partnership than the love matches made in parts of the world today, many couples clearly loved each other deeply, and the risks involved in bearing children weighed on entire families.
