At its most ambitious, the process aims to transform the parties and their relationship through the process of acquiring the skills they need to make constructive change. Have you used any of these types of mediation and did you find them effective? Instead of focusing primarily on the underlying interests of the parties involved, evaluative mediators may be more likely to help parties assess the legal merits of their arguments and make fairness determinations. We tend to think mediation processes are all alike, but in fact, mediators follow different approaches depending on the type of conflict they are dealing with.

Unlike in most , they typically agree in writing that the outcome of the process will be binding. So, rather than choosing it because it fits a certain type of dispute, it makes sense to choose it if one understands that the conflict, whether between business partners, consumers and corporations, injured plaintiffs and insurance companies, or neighbors, is at its most important level a crisis in the way humans are interacting with each other. When parties involved in a serious conflict want to avoid a court battle, there are types of mediation can be an effective alternative.
