Changing determinants of african mineworker mortality: Witwatersrand and the Copperbelt, 1911

It was administered by an indigenous council and presided over by an indigenous chief.

REFERENCES

During the mid-twenties, a number of colonial agencies including the government felt they were in competition for a limited number of African workers. Upon his return to the United States, Gorgas produced an elaborate report which proved unacceptable to both the South African government and to the top management of the mining industry.
