It's a way of cooking the world and putting it into images. After the war, along with thousands of others, they chose to go abroad and found that came down to a choice between New York and Liverpool.

Jackowski's explorations of personal and collective memory is at the root of his researches into identities and cultures as handed on and explored through stories and images.

Later I read Seamus Heaney's bog poems and realised how the land contains memories and associations, and other things like that.

He did, and his work was seen there by the artist, teacher and writer Peter de Francia, who was acting as an external assessor. He painted a large picture which he called The Tower of Copernicus, triggered by a kind of vision of a tower with a man lying in it, studying the stars. Liking neither, he tried his hand instead at making films - which would be perfectly acceptable in an art college today but was not so then, so he was more or less asked to leave.

It was a very dynamic time. Do not combine book information with biography. Married twice, he has a 28-year-old daughter from his first marriage and a 10-year-old son from his second.

'Cooking the world and putting it into images'

The sense of displacement in his paintings stems from a childhood spent living in wooden huts in a refugee camp in Wales, expecting to return to his native Poland after the War. The first is an inner figure, whereas the other is a more outward figure: together they open a door on to a luminous space, before a shadow of velvety darkness falls.

There are many strong biographies that you may refer to on our website, such as Cecilia Beaux, Edward Hopper, and Paul Sample. I respect a man like Paladino, but he's more mythic and - how can I put it - Jungian, dealing in a kind of tribal images mostly, while I'm more personal.

From there he went to the Falmouth School of Art, where the type of painting taught and encouraged was either a conservative, neo-romantic, Euston Road style or else big American colour-field canvases.
