Robert Leigh Davis, During the War [1875]

. Sometimes these wooden barracks or Wards, each of them, perhaps, from a hundred to a hundred and fifty feet long, are ranged in a straight row, evenly fronting the street; others are plann'd so as to form an immense V; and others again are ranged around a hollow square.

Thomson, at , and Oliphant, at the University of Birmingham, were tasked with carrying out a series of experiments on uranium. Memoranda During the War is a brave and beautiful act of witness by America's greatest poet--and one of her greatest souls. One was a strong Unionist, the other Secesh; both fought on their respective sides, both badly wounded, and both brought together here after absence of four years.

Memoranda During the War

It afforded me, too, the perusal of those subtlest, rarest, divinest volumes of Humanity, laid bare in its inmost recesses, and of actual life and death, better than the finest, most labor'd narratives, histories, poems in the libraries. They were all of pleasant, even handsome physiognomy; no refinement, nor blanch'd with intellect, but as my eye pick'd them, moving along, rank by rank, there did not seem to be a single repulsive, brutal or markedly stupid face among them. I stood unobserv'd in the darkness and watch'd them long.

The last week in April he was much of the time flighty—but always mild and gentle. You ought to see the scene of the wounded arriving at the landing here foot of Sixth street, at night.

Memoranda During the War book by Walt Whitman

I have at night watch'd by the side of a sick man in the hospital, one who could not live many hours. These deserters are far more numerous than would be thought. I am regularly supplied with funds for this purpose by good women and men in Boston, Salem, Providence, Brooklyn, and New York.
