Richard Long: Walking the Line by Sarah Whitfield

Some of the sculptor's oeuvre is created during his walks through the world's landscapes, while other works bring the materials of nature -- stones, boulders, branches, twigs, and mud -- into a more domestic or sheltered environment: museums, galleries, houses, gardens. The artwork was the walking. Incorporating elements of performance into the sculpture and preserving the work through photography, his process was as much about the resulting photograph as the sculpture was about expressing the journey and the event of walking.

Instead, the images show the marks he has made: footprints in river mud, paths scuffed through leaf litter, stones aligned or piled.

In this sense, it serves as a highly conceptual exploration of the transience of time, distance, and place, but presents these ideas in a very grounded and physical landscape.

It's probably what appeals to me most about Long and his work. From these walks emerge the idea and material for his works.

The resulting photographs all that now survive of these art acts are eerily cryptic.

Long's work returns to more mystical notions of artistic creation, although he conveys these ideas through minimalist means: here, the line shows an exertion of energy and human intentionality.
