It is indeed fortunate that Britain's necessity did not reach the point where Mr.

Restoration of Order in Ireland Act 1920

On 3 October, the Free State had offered an amnesty to any Anti-Treaty fighters who surrendered their arms and recognised the government. Approximately 12 spies were deployed, mostly with little success, including Ernst Weber-Drohl a former circus strongman and Henry Obed, an Indian.

Executions during the Irish Civil War

Another continuing argument is whether Anti-Treaty leaders believed that continuing the war would mean exposing their prisoners to further executions. The civil war and its aftermath to 1927 naturally receive the most detailed attention. From 8–18 February, the Free State suspended executions and offered an amnesty in the hope that Anti-Treaty fighters would surrender.

He did not know that the , , was urging London to seize the port at , or that attempts had been made to split the consensus over the Neutrality policy. The formal order convening the a General Court-Martial was issued on 15 October 1920, charging Barry with three counts of first degree murder relating to the three dead soldiers. De Valera rejected the revised proposal on 4 July and made no counter proposal.

The Emergency (Ireland)

The MPRP had claimed a majority of seats in the , but was accused of fraud and vote rigging by the less-successful parties. The use of execution by the Irish Free State in the Civil War was relatively harsh compared to the recent British record.
