FOR198/FR259: Reducing Conflict in the Wildland

Environmental Education Research 22 : 171—87. French, Spanish, Portuguese , which is not very well known and rarely cited. Focus groups, interviews, and casual conversations can help you know what words are not commonly understood.

FOR 112/FR166: Communication Basics in the Wildland

The implementation of a collaborative approach is needed, especially in the development of strategies to prevent and reduce fire risk in these areas. Resource agencies and extension offices are responsible for communicating some ideas and information that could cause the audience to react with fear, anger, or emotional distress.

Culture, Conflict, And Communication In The Wildland

Sometimes experts use language differently than the general public. They may even come up with a solution to the problem. A strong-arm tactic to get attention can backfire before the presenter gets a chance to explain how easy it is to mitigate the risk.

Culture, Conflict, And Communication In The Wildland

There is common ground to find. Words also have value connotations. To improve the chance of that new understanding being similar to what is intended, the extension agent or resource professional's responsibility is to present the information in such a way that the audience members are able to build their own understanding.

Wildland

Constituent support may be required for those seeking re-election. Fuel reduction strategies in forest communities: A longitudinal analysis of public support.

Wildland

With more complementary, rather than conflicting, desires, we can find more ways to share things, an elaboration of the Homans theory of complementary needs.
