The European Parliament and the European Union Security and Defence Policy

This page's document is:

Abstract:
Acquisition of collective authority in European and EU affairs was a significant turning point in the institutional history of the European Union. As the EU has become, as a result, the driver behind the adaptation of its changing international environment, the European Union's role in CSDP/EU issue areas with the issue of security and defence policy has become the significance of the EP's participation. The paper argues that the EP's influence on the Future of Europe also reflect this trend. The paper also highlights the role of Members, the EU organ closest to the European Parliament, in defining the relationship between the EU system and its international environment.

In these efforts, the European Parliament has played and will continue to play an important role. It is evasive and has a Houdini-like ability to escape accountability.

Collective defence and control of armaments

A number of instruments for cooperation between the European Parliament and the national parliaments have been introduced with a view to guaranteeing effective democratic scrutiny of European legislation at all levels. Both a principled and pragmatic approach. In diplomatic and military matters, the game is more complicated.

They note, for example, that development responses need to become more conflict sensitive, while security policies need to become more climate sensitive. Member States always have a war ship somewhere. These include policies and instruments which fall under Development Cooperation, Enlargement, the Stabilisation and Association Process, the European Neighbourhood Policy, Conflict Prevention and Crisis Management, Democracy and Human Rights, and the External Dimension of the area of Freedom, Security and Justice.
