Berlin Babylon: Apocalyptic Visions in Fritz Lang's Metropolis

It feels like what a great movie should be, is it one? It was also recorded for CD.

Die Nibelungen

In the meantime, the nice engineer's sister and brother-in-law are virtual prisoners of the Maharaja's kindness and they soon realize the man knows more about Hubschmid than he's admitting. She suspects deceit and refuses to consummate the marriage.

Metropolis (1927 film)

Lang and von Harbou had direct experience of this demoralized atmosphere, alongside the despair and vice attendant on the loss of the war Lang, 1975. There are some amusing blunders. In Part Two the pacing also picks up.

Thea von Harbou

Or anybody else you care about.

The Indian Tomb (1959)

As usual, Criterion includes a generous supplementary package with a pamphlet essay, a new audio commentary, a trailer, a documentary on director Ray, an interview about Grahame with her biographer, a featurette examining the film, and a 1948 radio adaptation of the same novel. Finally, the M script is here for all you quotes spouting fans of the Fritz Lang movie.

M (1931 scene) — in the penultimate scene of fritz lang's m (1931),

John's epistle then goes on to discuss the fall of Babylon and the eventual conquest over evil.
