In other words, the blood changes in the lungs its venous appearance, and assumes the character of arterial blood. With a fresh coat of white paint, the result is a fresh and clean fireplace. In the minute terminations of the arteries, the blood again loses its florid hue, and, reassuming its dark red colour, is returned through the veins to the right side of the heart, to be exposed, as before, to the.

The open fireplace in all ages. (1886 edition)

It wasn't so bad, this fireplace.
